MARIA + KIERAN THE STORMS ARE ON THE OCEAN

THE STORMS ARE ON THE OCEAN
MARIA + KIERAN

I regard tradition as progressive, and a traditional song as a progressive force because it is concerned with the continuity of things. The past is a population, a well of riches, and folk songs are the history of its common people, the expressions of their struggles, tribulations and superstitions, their guile, humour, love, lust, and violence. They're not words set to pretty tunes. You are being told something about people. Things that are wicked, naughty, true, funny. About what human beings do to each other, and it never changes. Folk music is not an archive, if you see it as that, it becomes like a butterfly in a glass case. Folk music has to live and breathe. I'm not interested in heritage, this stuff is alive, we must claim it, use it. Folk music has no border checkpoints. In the end, it has – it can have – no country.

I regard tradition as progressive, and a traditional song as a progressive force because it is concerned with the continuity of things. The past is a population, a well of riches, and folk songs are the history of the common people, the expression of their struggles, aspirations and aspirations, their quiet, humour, love, lust, and violence. They're not words set to pretty tunes. You are being told something about people. Things that are worked, taught, true, funny. About what human beings do to each other and it never changes. Folk music is not an artifice. If you see it as that, it becomes like a butterfly in a glass case. Folk music has to live and breathe. I'm not interested in heritage, the stuff is alive, we must claim it, use it. Folk music has no better backbone, in the end, it has - it can have - no continuity.
